The United States Congress is a bicameral legislature, meaning it consists of two separate chambers: the House of Representatives and the Senate. Each chamber has distinct roles, responsibilities, and methods of operation that contribute to the federal legislative process.

The House of Representatives

The House of Representatives is composed of 435 members, each serving a two-year term. The number of representatives from each state is determined by the state's population. This chamber is responsible for initiating revenue-related bills and has the exclusive power to impeach federal officials. The Speaker of the House, elected by the members, leads the House and plays a crucial role in setting the legislative agenda.

The Senate

The Senate includes 100 members, with each state represented by two senators serving six-year terms. The Senate has the authority to confirm presidential nominations, ratify treaties, and conduct impeachment trials.
