During this time, postdocs engage in advanced research, often under the guidance of a principal investigator, and are expected to contribute significantly to the academic environment.

One of the primary purposes of a postdoc is to allow recent PhD graduates to deepen their research experience and expand their professional networks. This is particularly crucial in academia, where collaboration and communication with established professionals can significantly enhance one's career prospects. Postdoctoral positions can also help individuals clarify their research interests and refine their skills in specific areas of psychology, ranging from clinical psychology to cognitive neuroscience.
